Diversity roundtable

With Jeff Jacobsen

Lea Spikes, Edel Alexander and Regina Bradley attended the Diversity Roundtable

An opportunity to communicate, engage & network

On February 3rd, 2016, individuals from different diversity and caucus groups in Xerox had an opportunity to sit down with Jeff Jacobson for a roundtable session.

Roundtables are a critical part of our engagement and communications strategy in Xerox that provides an opportunity for two way feedback and communication. It is a great way for leaders to gauge the pulse of the people and for employees to network and create mutually beneficial relationships across the organization.

Comments from the participants of the February 3rd roundtable:

“The roundtable was a productive session and time well spent. Jeff’s candor, positive attitude and energy were greatly appreciated. It was also a great opportunity to meet other participants, make new connections and hear diverse view points and questions about the business.” Edel Alexander

“Jeff, thank you for your time, your enthusiasm, and positive energy! Here’s to a great 2016 rowing in the boat together!” Lucy Perez

“Thanks Jeff for the opportunity to meet you and thank you for sharing your energy and positive thinking with all of us! Cheers to a great 2016!” Yamila Feliz

“Jeff, Thanks again for your time and candid feedback on Xerox path forward. As suggested, I will reach out with ideas on how the caucus groups can be more instrumental in driving diversity initiatives indirectly impacting our bottom line.” Regina Bradley

Thank you to all the participants for taking time to join the roundtable.

To the Wonderful Women of BWLC...

This is to the WONDERFUL women of the Black Women's Leadership Council (BWLC).

It is hard to believe that three years have already flown by, but as a result (and quite regretfully), my tenure as the Corporate Champion of the BWLC has expired. I truly wish this was a position that came with a lifetime appointment, as it is a role I absolutely loved! The good news, is that the BWLC will be in even better hands, with Sue Watts as the new Corporate Champion. Sue is a very passionate leader who will relate very well to the mission of the BWLC.

I remember when I received Ursula's letter appointing me to the Corporate Champion role three years ago. My main concern was whether I could do "justice" to the role, and that I would provide the appropriate champion spirit and leadership for the amazing women of the BWLC. While my performance is something that is judged by our membership, I can say that I tried to always give it my all.

As I briefly reflect back, it is fair to say that I learned more from our membership, than they learned from me. It has made me a better leader in so many ways. I have to admit, that I always loved attending our Summits. There is nothing better than being with the women of the BWLC. Whether it is the seminars; the "real talk," or the indescribable High Tea and hat contests☺, there was always tremendous learning, laughter, respect and love for the "sisterhood."

While in some ways it was my role to "watch over" the members of the BWLC, I was the one who always felt the power and the comradery of being with each of you. While my "official" role as Corporate Champion has come to an end; and while I have to represent all Xerox employees equally; it will be our little secret that I will always have an extra "eye looking out" for the group of women who will always be so very special to me.

While the BWLC may officially stand for the Black Women's Leadership Council; to me, and as a group, it will always be the Best Women the Lord Created!

Thank You! Thank You! Thank You!

Jeff Jacobson

I was the one who always felt the power and the comradery of being with each of you.

History of the Black Women's Leadership Council (BWLC)

Looking Back and Moving Forward as We Celebrate 30 Years

By Kimberly Sealy and Edel Alexander

This year 2016, marks the 30th anniversary of the BWLC. This milestone presents opportunities for us to reflect on our organization. Why was the BWLC formed? How we can contribute to the objectives of this great organization?

Why was the BWLC formed?

In order to appreciate the growth and vitality of the BWLC, it is necessary for us to look back at the environment and conditions for black women 30 years ago at Xerox Corporation:

Sylvia, one of the highest-ranking black women at Xerox in the mid-1980s, was concerned about the lack of leadership opportunities for black women within Xerox Corporation. Black women were not placed in leadership roles but cast in supporting roles with very little or no chance at upward mobility. Her personal philosophy was, black women needed to help and support other black women. She set out on her mission with one goal in mind, success, and with the basic principle of taking one-step at a time. Sylvia's actions included, sending letters to all of the confidential level Black women at the company, inviting them to a weekend meeting in Atlanta, Georgia. She set two expectations for all attendees in the invitational letter: the first was to focus on what could be done to help each other, and the second was to personally pay for their travel expenses. The intent of the meeting was to address personal needs and evaluate personal agendas. Thirteen black women attended this first meeting in 1986 at Sylvia's home in Atlanta. This meeting of the following founders set the stage for the beginning of the BWLC: Sylvia Chambers, Joan Butler, Lynn Edmonds Carter, Diane Delaware, Marlene Williams, Little Brown, Cecilia Gordon, Marcia Knowles Matthews, Sandra Nelms, Carol Wilkins, Charlene Roderick, Viette Warren, and Diana Green (late).

The black women at the "Atlanta" meeting agreed to get together twice a year. Those early meetings included personal career

INTRODUCING SUE!

Our New Corporate Champion for BWLC: Sue Watts

Sue Watts
Chief Operating Officer
for Xerox Services

Sue Watts is the COO (Chief Operating Officer) for Xerox Services and is responsible for delivery leadership, driving offer development and strategy in Xerox's service capabilities. She is an industry veteran with deep experience leading global organizations and business transformation initiatives in business process outsourcing, applications management and development, and IT outsourcing operations. In her current role, she strengthens Xerox's ability to deliver excellence to clients and strong results for the company.

Watts comes to Xerox from Capgemini, a consulting, outsourcing and professional services company, where she served as CEO for the Americas Outsourcing Business.

A 1984 business graduate of Indiana University, Watts completed her M.B.A. from the University of Notre Dame.

I am hopeful that through this outreach campaign that more women become aware of the Black Women's Leadership Council.

There is tremendous value to be gained organizationally and individually such as stronger professional collaboration, facilitation of upward and lateral mobility, greater workplace awareness, higher retention, talent showcasing, and development.

I encourage our women to invest some time to get to know the Black Women's Leadership Council better and consider making a commitment to become an active member.

Best regards, Sue

BWLC FOUNDATION FUNDRAISING EVENT

Jazz featuring Walter Chatman XP

The newsworthy topic from the Foundation is the Fundraiser that was held on 3/18/2016 in Rochester, NY. It was an evening of Jazz featuring Walter Chatman XP, a local Jazz Band that also has a BWLC member in the group, Lauren Haskin. The BWLC Foundation Fund-raiser was held at Gallery One Fine Arts, which is owned by David Haygood a local African American artist. The refreshments were donated by Unkl Moe's BBQ and Catering. The wine was donated by Constellation Brands.

Although attendance was not what we had hoped for, the Foundation was able to raise $1,005 from ticket sales and donations.

History of the Black Women's Leadership Council (BWLC)

planning sessions and networking. Participation expanded beyond the original founders and agendas evolved to include status on headcount, hiring, terminations and promotions of the Xerox exempt black female population. In 1989, at a meeting in Stamford, Connecticut, the organization as we know it, was formalized and given the name, the Black Women's Leadership Council (BWLC).

In 1990 in Washington, DC, a new precedent was set with the invitation of a Xerox senior executive to dialogue with membership on Black Women's issues in an open forum. Paul Allaire, Xerox CEO, came to the Washington, DC meeting to address and discuss the challenges faced by black women at Xerox. In the audience were also local women from the Washington, D.C. area, regardless of their grade levels. Members explained to Mr. Allaire that black women faced unique challenges in the corporation because they faced both sexism and racism. In addition, while majority women and black males had been promoted into positions with significant decision-making power, Black women were still not being given the opportunity to function at these levels.

Another milestone for the BWLC happened in 1997. The first BWLC Conference was held at the Xerox Training Center in Leesburg, Virginia. Black women at all grade levels, exempt and non-exempt Xerox employees, attended.

The BWLC Foundation was formed under the community outreach umbrella to give scholarships to black female high school seniors, who were college-bound.

How we can contribute to the objectives of this great organization?

The BWLC has made significant progress influencing the upward mobility of many qualified black women into management and senior management roles. We must continue to be vigilant and united in identifying opportunities for advancement within the corporation. We provide opportunities for you through our sister-to-sister calls, workshops, summits, and conferences to learn, make new connections, discuss and share your thoughts and ideas, receive constructive feedback, career and personal development strategies, etc.

Let us continue the legacy of those thirteen (13) courageous women who opened the doors for us. In turn, we can extend a helping hand to other women in the corporation to ensure these doors remain open. We can accomplish this by coaching, mentoring, educating, and developing other women to maximize and exceed their potential and surpass their identified career goals.
